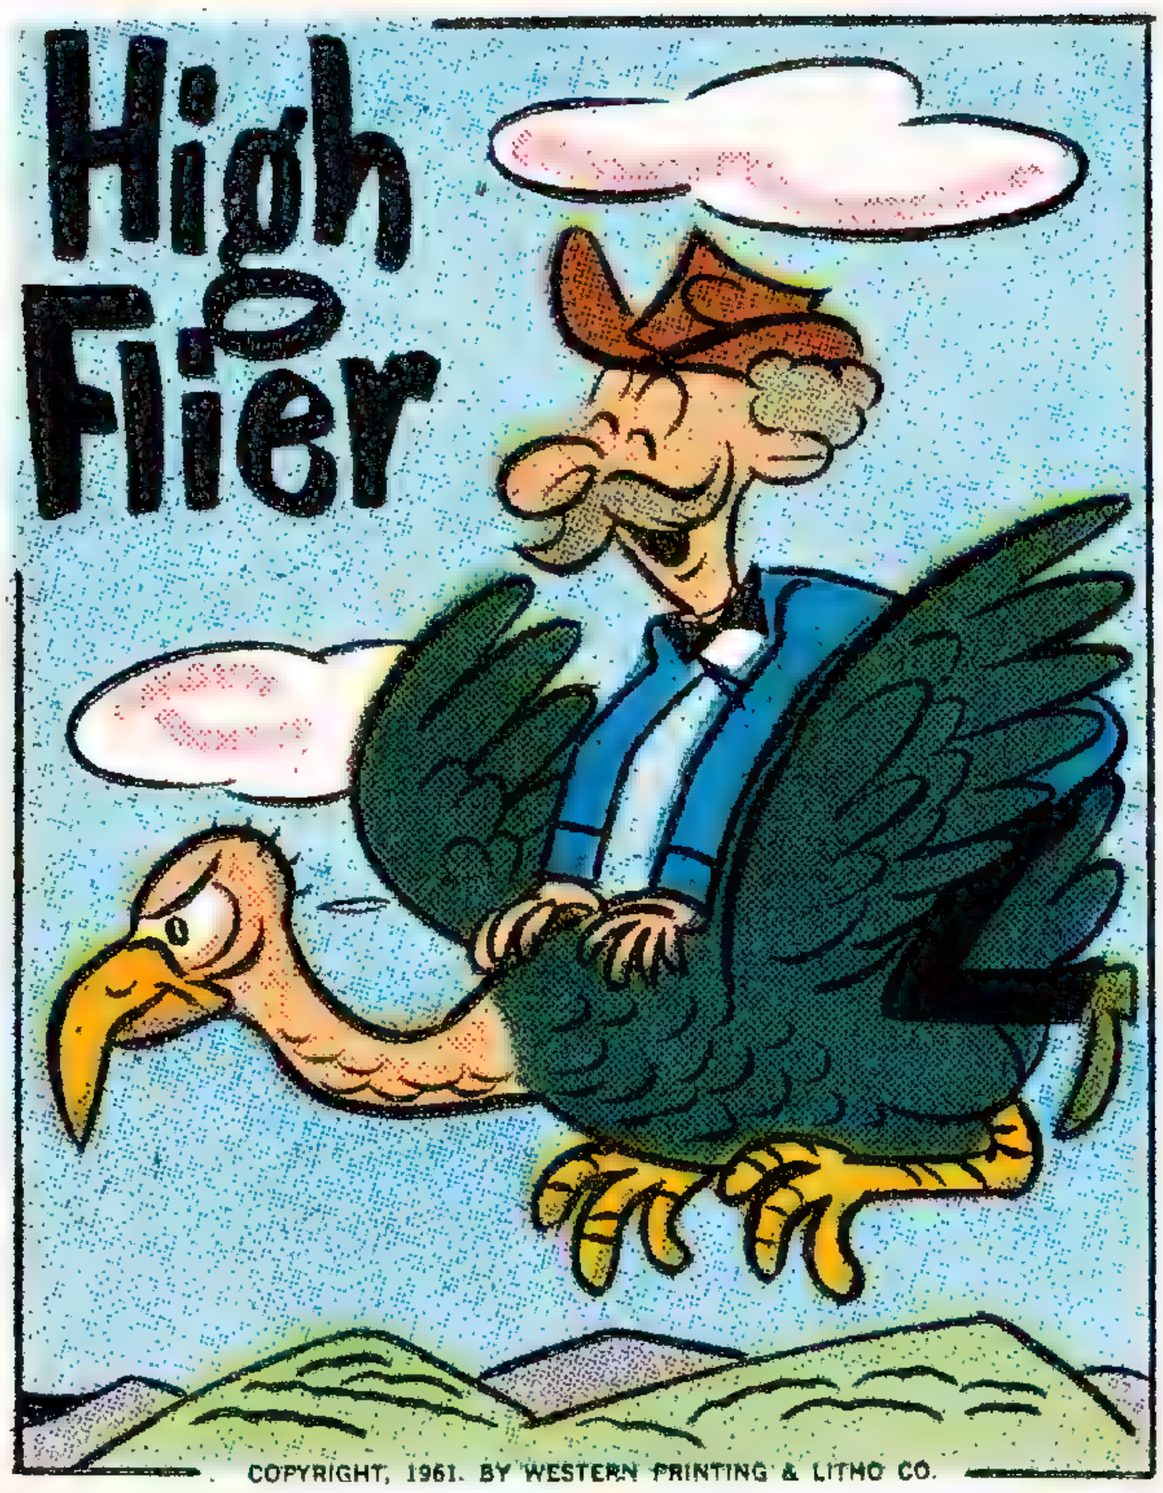
BUD SAGENDORF



"Boy, would I like to ride piggy-back on one of those!" John Hardy said.

John was lying on his back on a grassy hill, watching some wild geese fly over. His Uncle Elmo was with him, watching too. Uncle Elmo had been everywhere and had seen about everything.

"It is fun," Uncle Elmo said quietly.

"What is?" John asked.

"Riding on the back of a bird."

"You say it as though you had!"

"Why sure," said Uncle Elmo. "Didn't I ever tell you about my bird ride?"

"Ho, ho!" John laughed. "It would have to be a pretty big bird."

Uncle Elmo nodded. "What's the biggest bird in the world?"

"An ostrich. But an ostrich can't fly."

"I'm talking about the biggest flying bird."

"Then you're talking about a condor."

"That's right. A condor."

John gasped. "You flew through the air on a condor?"

Uncle Elmo nodded. "Nothing to it," he said modestly.

John smiled in delight. "Tell me about it. And if you say it happened in the Rocky Mountains I'll know you're fibbing right from the start."

"Oh, I wouldn't try to fool you, John. It happened in the Andes mountains in South America."

"You're all right so far," John said. "Condors live in the Andes. How did you catch him? With a lasso? I know you used to be a cowboy for the King ranch."

"I didn't exactly catch him, John. I just climbed astride."

"How did you do that?"

"Well, I sighted this condor in the bottom of a rocky canyon—kind of a small rocky hollow. He couldn't see over it very far and it was easy to sneak up on him."

"He'd see you when you got close."

"Yes, but I was wearing a feathered rug the Indians made for me. The condor thought I was another bird—until I flung myself on his back."

John's eyes were twinkling with mischief. "Then what?"

"Why then he took off, that's all. I heeled him like I would a horse, and he flapped his great wings, and we were airborne. Of course, it was an extra big condor."

"Of course," John said.

"At first, he tried to buck me off, the way a wild horse would. He twisted and turned and went up and down, and once turned a complete loop. But I stuck on him, and when he realized I was his master, he smoothed out his wings and took me on the grandest ride I ever had. We went over the mountains all the way to the Pacific Ocean and back. I steered him as easily as I would a horse. Finally I guided him down at the place where we had started, and got off. He pecked at me playfully as I walked away. I think he enjoyed it all as much as I did."

John was lying on his back now and laughing so hard that his heels were in the air. "I caught you, Uncle Elmo," he said. "Even if you didn't try to fool me by saying it happened in the Rocky Mountains."

Uncle Elmo grinned. "Where did I slip up this time?"

"You said the condor started up from the bottom of a rocky hollow. A condor's wings are so big, and he is so heavy, he has to have a cliff or steep slope to jump off of before he can even fly!"
